

February 20 • School Board Meeting Recap

Edison Bond: The Next Step

Although the election doesn't officially certify until later today, last night Business Manager Aron Rausch said planning steps to build the 63,000 square foot school have already begun.

In what Rausch described as hectic, but exciting, times he unveiled a four-page document detailing a seven month schedule to get the project design process underway.

Last week Rausch met with John Evans of Architects West in what he referred to as the first project meeting. Evans and his firm designed the award winning Sharpstein Elementary modernization seven years ago.

Rausch said he feels comfortable working with Architects West since a relationship has already been established through the Sharpstein project. He also said area sub-contractors have praised the district's choice, noting the firm's exceptional record for communications and attention to detail.

Planning highlights to look for in the coming weeks:

- Meet with home owners (get appraisals on 8 homes)
- Organize neighborhood meetings
- Conduct monthly planning meetings
- Develop design standards for 21st Century classrooms
- Work with financial advisor (Seattle NW Securities)
- Meet with Edison staff
- Hire construction manager (Roen & Associates)
- Competitive bond sale
- Apply for state matching funds
- Edison construction project page on district's website

Collaboration schedule to remain split

Challenges of common schedule out weigh benefits

In a unanimous decision last night, school board members voted to keep the district's Wednesday collaboration schedule the same.

After months of study which included parent and staff surveys, discussions with outside district officials and numerous planning meetings, Assistant Superintendent Linda Boggs said last night final reports reveal there are more challenges to creating a K-12 common collaboration schedule than benefits.

Boggs said most of the challenges revolve around student safety, supervision, learning trends, and student program demands.

As a result of these findings, the district will continue offering a split schedule on Wednesdays -- early release for elementary and late start for secondary students -- for teacher collaboration and training. Boggs stressed teacher collaboration remains a high priority and is positively impacting learning.

"We recognize this split schedule presents challenges for some families, but when you look at what's best for students the split schedule best meets their needs," Boggs said.

Boggs reminded school board members that all schools have options for parents which vary from open gym to study sessions if they need to keep their children in school during collaboration time.

"All principals are committed to working with parents' individual needs if our current options don't work," Boggs said.
